Thank you for tagging us in your campaign. Organic farms are legally required to follow strict rules to minimise impacts on the environment and animal welfare, and when problems occur, they must prove they are taking action in order to use the organic logo. But we recognise there are still many challenges to be tackled, which is why we are currently reviewing our aquaculture standards. We are listening hard to concerns and we have convened an independent group of experts to look at what good welfare looks like for farmed salmon from a fish viewpoint, as well as considering environmental impacts. Updates on this environment and animal welfare, and when problems occur, they must prove they are taking action in order to use the organic logo. But we recognise there are still many challenges to be tackled, which is why we are currently reviewing our aquaculture standards. We are listening hard to concerns and we have convened an independent group of experts to look at what good welfare looks like for farmed salmon from a fish viewpoint, as well as considering environmental impacts. Updates on this process will be shared at key moments as it reaches its conclusion, which is expected in Winter 2024/25.
